

SPEND $30 AND YOU COULD WIN
$30,000
PLUS $10,000 IN WEEKLY DRAWS!

TODAY
WE SET YOU THINKING

Tuesday, July 24, 2012 Weather  31 / 24 °C

TODAY  Commentary & Analysis | Voices | People | Singapore | Focus | World | Business | Technology | Sports | Photos | Videos |

T  Culture & Lifestyle | Arts & Design | Travel | Food | Cars | Style & Beauty | Things To Do | Blogs | NYT - TODAY |

  Latest: Cheese could reduce diabetes risk, scientists ... | Search Stories

Home > World > Women's sexual fantasies less depraved than men's, scientists claim

Women's sexual fantasies less depraved than men's, scientists claim

Updated 11:59 AM Jul 22, 2012

LONDON - The novel Fifty Shades of Grey may have housewives experiencing something of a sexual renaissance, but women's steamiest thoughts are still tame compared with the male imagination, scientists claim.

While men spend more time thinking about sex than their partners overall, a survey found that women have more fantasies which could be described as "pleasant".

Men, on the other hand, are more likely to occupy their minds with wilder and more exploratory ideas such as "swinging" with other couples or taking part in an orgy, researchers found.

Women more frequently imagined being forced into submission in a sexual scenario - but they also took less enjoyment from the idea than men, the Daily Telegraph reported.

Ms Nieves Moyano Munoz, who led the study, said: "These fantasies are not very frequent but compared with men, women have more. But they experience it in a more negative way."

The researchers, from the University of Granada, questioned 2,250 Spanish people who had been in a heterosexual relationship for at least six months about the frequency and nature of their sexual thoughts.

Their results, published in the Anales de Psicología journal, showed that almost all participants had experienced a pleasant sexual fantasy at some point in their life, and 80 per cent had also had a negative one.

The team said there were not "significant" differences between men's and women's racy thoughts, but that there were subtle differences between the sexes in the scenarios that they imagined.

Although men had more sexual fantasies in total, women reported having "pleasant" fantasies "a few" times a month - a greater frequency than men.

Men were more likely to admit having either positive or negative thoughts about experimental activities, such as "being promiscuous", "being a swinger" or "participating in an orgy", although most said that they only had such fantasies once a year or at some point in their life.

Ms Munoz added: "These are not very frequently experienced - in normal life men and women have very similar fantasies. They have this type of fantasy about one or two times in their whole life."

Sexual submission was the least enjoyable fantasy among women, with most imagining it at least once in their life, while for men the most negative thoughts involved homosexual activities.

The survey was aimed at helping determine whether unpleasant fantasies harm the development of healthy sexual behaviour.

Researchers pointed out that imagining sex could be helpful in some ways, for example by encouraging sexual desire or arousal.

They suggested that therapists should not only ask whether or not people have fantasies about sex, but also consider their attitude towards them.

AGENCIES

 enlarge this photo

The novel Fifty Shades of Grey may have housewives experiencing something of a sexual renaissance, but their fantasies are considered tame when compared to men's. AP

Find us on Facebook

 TODAY on Facebook

20,682

OTHER WORLD HEADLINES

- Human foetuses found in Russian forest
- Late night TV, computer sessions linked to depression
- Cheese could reduce diabetes risk, scientists say
- 'Goat man' in Utah mountains is hunter: Wildlife official
- US sub worker set fire so he could leave early: US Navy
- Drink juice, not Coke, Chavez tells Venezuelans
- Latest Amelia Earhart search falls short
- Question after floods: Did China build too fast?
- UK hacking scandal spreads, 100-plus new claims
- Virgin Australia cabin crew told to stop calling passengers 'mate'
- Study raises hope for new drugs for resistant TB
- Hip and knee replacements tied to heart attack risk
- Bill Gates says much more work needed to turn tide of AIDS
- Close relationships tied to ovarian cancer survival
- Elton John: 'I shouldn't be here today'

Today's PDF Print Edition

VIDEOS OF THE DAY

Recent Activity

You need to be logged into Facebook to see your friends' recent activity.

 Women 'deliberately post ugly photos of friends online'
46 people recommend this.

 Muslims face Ramadan dilemma
174 people recommend this.

